The exhibition The Unveiled Interiors explores the notion of space as a refuge for the self—yet, paradoxically, in Corina Nani’s works, this space is laid bare to an unfiltered gaze. The cubic rooms she constructs, employing the linear perspective techniques pioneered by the early Quattrocento masters—who sought to reclaim spatial depth through lines converging at a singular vanishing point—become vast, stark, depopulated interiors, fully exposed to scrutiny. What remains when one of the cube’s walls collapses, revealing the interior in its entirety? The artist seems to pose this very question. As a whole, The Unveiled Interiors challenges the way we present ourselves to the world in relation to the spaces—both physical and mental—that we seek for refuge and protection. —
